Who we are

Gengage brings together, promotes and supports individuals and organisations working in Scotland to increase public awareness, dialogue and debate on issues to do with healthcare genetics.

We connect healthcare professionals and patient groups, science communicators and public engagement practitioners as well as social scientists and other academics.

What we do

Sharing experience and good practice.

We work across Scotland to offer professionals working in a wide range of fields the opportunity to learn from each other about what works and what doesn't when engaging the public in healthcare genetics.

Promoting research and evaluation.

Gengage runs workshops, seminars and training to further social science research, to share findings with wider audiences and to consider how this can influence practice.

Training to build capacity and capability.

One of Gengage's main functions is to help people develop the necessary knowledge and skills to engage the public effectively on issues to do with healthcare genetics. We are developing a training programme that will run throughout Scotland to meet these needs.

Facilitating dialogue.

Our aim is not only to improve communication and make connections between individuals working to improve public engagement, but also to facilitate dialogue with policy makers at the national, regional and local level.

Connecting people who work to enhance public engagement in healthcare genetics in Scotland
